Early Life and Family

Martha Dandridge was born on June 2, 1731, into a prominent planter family in New Kent County, Virginia. Her father, John Dandridge, was a wealthy tobacco planter, and her mother, Frances Jones Dandridge, was a well-educated and accomplished woman.

Martha received an education befitting her social status, studying subjects such as reading, writing, arithmetic, needlework, and music. She was known for her intelligence, poise, and strong character.

Marriage to George Washington

In 1758, Martha Dandridge married George Washington, a rising military officer and planter from Virginia. Despite their significant age difference (Martha was 28, while George was 46), the couple had a successful and loving marriage.

Martha played a vital role in supporting George's military career during the American Revolutionary War. She traveled with him on his campaigns and provided him with unwavering emotional and practical support.

First Lady of the United States

After the war, George Washington was elected as the first President of the United States in 1789. Martha Washington became the inaugural First Lady, setting the standard for the role that would be filled by generations of presidential spouses.
