

The Fall and Recapture of Detroit in the War of 1812

The Siege of Detroit

In the summer of 1812, the British and their Native American allies launched an invasion of the United States. Their目标 was to capture Detroit, which was then the capital of the Michigan Territory. The British believed that by capturing Detroit, they could cut off the United States from its western territories and gain control of the fur trade. The siege of Detroit began on July 17, 1812, when British forces under the command of General Isaac Brock arrived at the city. Brock demanded the surrender of the city, but the American commander, General William Hull, refused. Brock then laid siege to the city, and after a week of bombardment, Hull surrendered on August 16, 1812. The fall of Detroit was a major blow to the United States, and it led to the loss of control of the Michigan Territory.
